Fortunately for human kind there is greater purity and a higher grade of virtue in woman than in man. If there was not there would certainly be little hope for humanity: Its moral growth h s been slow enough at best, but undoubtedly whatever of progress has been made we are indebted principally to the refining, christianizing, pure and elevating influence of women.

that fixes one standard by which to judge the chastity and constancy of the female sex, and another for the male sex, but perhaps it is for the best. A man can be a roue and a debauche, and it scarce ly lowers his grade and position in society. His own do not scorn nor the opposite sex despise him. He is feted and toasted, and wined and dined, if he is of brilliant parts and can give receptions as well as receive, the same as if he was spotless as the mythical Joseph when beguiled by the Egyptian queen. Julius Caesar required that his wife should be absolutely above suspicion, e' sans reproche. But Mr. Cæsar was one of the greatest of rakes, and no Mrs. Julius ever required her Casar to be above suspicion. But it is, perhaps better, harsh and rough as it seems, to apply this rule-better for the growth and progress of society. It is the only safety humanity has, the only hope for human progress. Says the ano and play as divinely and sing as witty Holmes:

The proper study of markind is man. The most perplexing, no doubt, is woman.

The study of womon is undoubtedly the most interesting, though perp'exing it may be, study one can engage in. The primeval recollection, and, the first thought the infant has is for and nourishing care only a mother can give. Love goes toward love as schoolboys from their books, says Shakspeare, and the first and freshest thoughts and freest fancies of the strippling school boy, are not of his books, but of the blushing and daisy becomes. At his twentieth year the boy will fight for his girl; at his thirdelicious. And so it is that poets elist tells us to "bevare of the vidders." And yet men will be beguiled until the end of time. So long as woman is charming and lovely as she now is, man will never see anything so inviting in this world as woman. If Adam had the whole thing to do over, I have no doubt he would prefer an apple from the fair hand of Eve, taken surreptitiously and underhand with its value thus wonderfully enhanced, to an eternity in Eden.

I have said that I have seen many men and many places, and I may say seen the latter in all respects equalling in glory the
